1 Results

On the occasion of establishing a Metreringen subway station just south for the Frederiksberg Centeret, Frederiksberg, Museum of Copenhagen has conducted watching briefs as archaeological pre investigations (figure 1, 2, table 1).

The excavation site was located c. 300 m north-east for the former medieval village Solbjerg (fig. 1). In 2002 Museum of Copenhagen conducted an archaeological excavation (KBM 2526) just west for the actual site, which revealed prehistoric pits, probably representing an iron age settlement (fig. 2).

Museum archaeologists were present only during the preparatory excavations of the site, when nothing of archaeological interest was recorded. Due to infelicitous circumstances the excavation of the main trench was conducted without any archaeological supervision.

Further archaeological investigations at Frederiksberg Station might have revealed some complementary information on the oldest history of this part of Frederiksberg. This, however, presupposes the conditions of preservation on the site to be excellent, which is not likely to be the case.
